

COMFORT ZONE: A FILM ABOUT CHANGE

COMFORT ZONE is a powerful and engaging tool for deepening discussion of climate change.

- Introduce the science of climate change in an accessible way
- Give audiences a visceral understanding of how they will be affected personally
- Demonstrate how to take individual action
- Create a space for exploration of the larger issues, including:
 - How people relate to the earth and to each other
 - The potential and limits of individual action
 - The spiritual dimensions of this crisis.

ABOUT THE FILM

What should we do about climate change? Three residents of upstate New York—Kate, Dave and Sean—tackle this question each in a different way, and for different reasons. Kate worries that her children will grow up in a different world—one more challenging than the world she grew up in. Dave sees the climate problem as an internal crisis that each person must approach from the inside out. Sean gets to the root of the science behind the greenhouse effect, and looks at possible solutions.

COMFORT ZONE takes an in-depth look at what happens when global climate issues come to our backyards. The specific setting is Upstate New York, but the effects, both subtle and profound, illustrate the kinds of effects that can happen anywhere. It's a compelling, consciousness-changing, and often funny film that presents a global issue from a personal perspective, challenging us to confront our own connection to climate change.

Runtime: 67 Minutes, DVD also includes 26 minutes of additional scenes
